

AMERICAN LAW FOR FOREIGN LAWYERS, LL.M.

Saint Louis University's one-year master's degree for foreign law graduates provides an introduction to U.S. law. The main feature of SLU's LL.M. (Master of Laws) program for foreign lawyers is its attention to the individual needs of its students. Each LL.M. student is partnered with a faculty member who provides guidance on class selection and professional goals. Students also receive intensive academic support services and assistance in locating housing and orienting to the law school community.

Students in SLU's LL.M. program have access to top-tier faculty as well as to leading scholars, practitioners and employers.

Curriculum Overview

LL.M. students complete 24 credits of coursework over two semesters, generally in the fall and spring, with the opportunity to continue through the following summer to complete a thesis. Students choose from the full range of courses and seminars offered at the School of Law and may select up to three credits of courses from Saint Louis University's Chaifetz School of Business, College for Public Health and Social Justice, or 44 other graduate programs.

Fieldwork and Research Opportunities

Students are required to complete a three-credit course in legal research and writing, as well as a foundation course in a common law subject such as contracts, torts or property. Additionally, LL.M. students produce a written work, such as a seminar paper or a directed research paper. LL.M. students may elect to write an LL.M. thesis for six credits. No more than eight of the 24 credits may consist of an LL.M. thesis, seminars or research papers.
